After my habit, I rehearsed it beforehand. Surely my eloquent appeal had moved the great man to tears. I saw him opening his arms, giving me the accolade and dubbing me knight. He wept, and I wept, and weeping we interchanged admirable speeches worthy to be handed down to posterity. When I reached his door it was only half-past ten, and I might be interrupting Tronsko in the middle of a lesson. That did not stop me, and I mounted the stairs, the least heroic in appearance of all winding stairs. There was a smell of broken victuals and fried onions by no means appetising. It is not the first time I have remarked that very little attention is paid by life to the mise-en-schie. I knocked three times at a little door, and without awaiting an answer went in. Tronsko was giving a lesson on the German conjugations to a young dandy, who twisted his light moustache negligently as he listened. Tronsko pointed to me a chair, on which I sat down, and studied the cave of the lion. It was a fairly large room, clean, well-kept, shewing a poverty that respected itself; not a spot, not a hole, not a speck of dust. I expected some romantic and genial disorder, but Tronsko kept his little place with the orderliness of a good Dutch housemaid. When I had completed my survey I listened to the lesson. Certainly there...
